Business model for mobile app development

freemium model

The freemium model allows the developers to get a massive user base because it's free for the user. For the revenue, it offers the option for users to enhance their experience through purchases and subscriptions within the app, also called in-app purchases.

Do note that only around 2% of the users will get converted in the best case, but the other 98% help you reach the potential audience. The reach makes the model very powerful and is widely popular for games and other mobile applications

Advertisements

Digital advertisements have become widely prevalent and easy to integrate. Several platforms like Google Ads allow app developers to run ads in their app's interface and earn money out of it.

It is a great business model, and developers need not demand money from the users, while they can generate decent revenues.

Wanna Avail High-Quality Mobile App Development Services?

Hire Developers

Earnings per user is quite minimal unless too many ads are pushed. Doing that hampers the user experience and also drives them away. Hence, the success of this model relies on a wide user base.

Subscription/ SaaS Model

It relies on users buying the app subscription in exchange for its services. With the rise of OTT apps like Netflix and Amazon Prime, this model has gained prominence quickly.

The users will pay a certain amount of money on a monthly or annual basis, and the users can access the app properly, i.e., without being disturbed by ads.

This model is widely popular for video-streaming, music, and e-book related applications.

You can also adopt a free trial period or keep some of the content free for everyone to lure more customers.

Sponsorships

Sponsors pay a certain sum of money to collaborate with the app to initiate or integrate their campaign in their app. For this, your app should have a large user base or a great reach in a niche-specific group.

Example: Zomato displaying the restaurants it has partnered with on top of its application to incite more orders from these restaurants.

Affiliate Marketing

Most e-commerce apps like Amazon and Flipkart offer affiliate memberships for their platforms.

If a sale is made through the affiliate member's link on the e-commerce website, the member receives a certain percentage as commission. It allows the app developers to earn decent money without hampering the user experience with ads or compel them to pay.

Nowadays, affiliate marketing has established its existence in several other types of businesses apart from e-commerce. This model can be easily applied by reviewers or apps that can influence decisions.

E-commerce applications

You can either choose to sell your products or allow other sellers to list their products on your platform.

If you opt for the first option, there will profit margins for the products you sell. For the latter, you charge a certain percentage of commission from the seller.

This model has already proved its mettle, making Jeff Bezos the richest man on Earth for a considerable time.

Paid Apps

- Both the well-known application stores in existence, the Google Play Store and App Store by Apple, allow app developers to list their apps on their platforms either for free or by paying a certain amount of money.
- If you choose to make your app a paid one, you will earn money every time someone installs the app.
- both the App Store and Play Store charge 15% as commissions for all the sales made through their platforms for the first 1 million dollars each year.
- If the revenues are more than a million dollars, Play Store charges 30% for everything beyond the million, while Apple shall levy 30% on the whole amount.
- Although an attractive prospect, it limits your audience substantially.
- Developers should adopt this model only after proper market research based on extensive data.

Commissioned Apps

- Businesses need customers to keep thriving. Customers need assistance from various businesses for a bunch of their daily needs.
- If you can act as an intermediary between the two parties through an app, both of them wouldn't mind paying some extra money as commissions for the convenience your app provides.
- Due to this, this model has gained popularity, and around 26% of developers are building apps this way, earning the lion's share of 56% from the total revenue.

Selling the user data

- With the advent of data science and data analytics, data has become a more prized possession than diamond and gold. Data can be used in several ways by organisations to generate results.
- Example: schools selling their students' data, like their phone numbers and email addresses, to coaching institutes. The coaching institutes then use the data to know about the interests of the students and persuade them to attend their classes.
- People have become too conscious of sharing their data, which is not wrong. Data is sensitive information, and this business model should be avoided if possible and only be used as a last resort.

In-app Purchases

This model is used as a combination with a free download of the application, adding the option to purchase specific features, virtual goods, disable advertising, digital content and so forth.

By offering related services return on investment can be made.

This model is common in gaming applications.

Hearings

Access to this type of application is granted to all users.
Its sole purpose is to build a large user base and later will be used for other reasons.

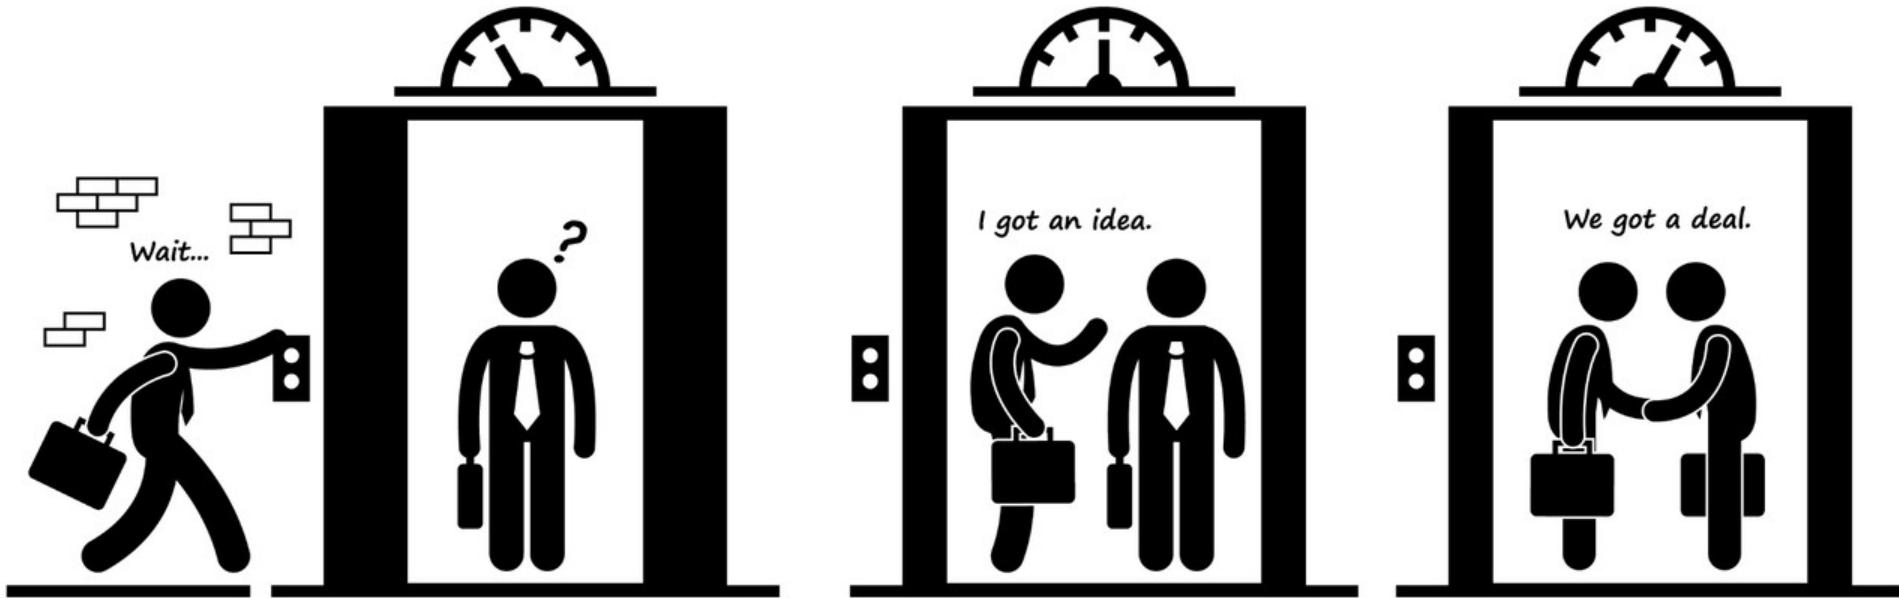

A clear example of this business model would be Facebook.

ELEVATOR PITCH

Se ti dicessero di
presentare te stesso e
il tuo business in soli
60 secondi cosa diresti
e come lo diresti?

Elevator pitch

An elevator pitch is traditionally a very quick introduction of yourself or your idea designed to create interest for a longer meeting.

They usually last from 30 to 60 seconds.

Elevator pitches supposedly came from Hollywood, where screenwriters would hop on an elevator to pitch a studio executive an idea for a film.

One sentence speech

I help X to achieve Y By Doing Z

- X = Audience
- Y= Value
- Z =How

Relevance

Creating a compelling elevator pitch constitutes a key skill for any business professional.

By condensing your idea and request into a short narrative, you can quickly see if your listener is interested and potentially start a relationship with a prospective client, partner or employer.

"Do you often find yourself overwhelmed by tasks that aren't directly contributing to your goals? Many individuals share this sentiment. I vividly recall the days of tirelessly slogging through endless to-do lists. However, with the integration of project management software into our workflow, I've witnessed a remarkable surge in productivity. Have you explored similar solutions to streamline your workload?"

Elevator pitch example: looking for a startup investor at a networking event

Networking events can be a great place to practise and use your elevator pitch to find an investor for your project. Here's an example of an elevator pitch for a ride-sharing service:

'Hi, my name is Travis, and I hate having to wait on cabs. Have you ever had trouble getting a cab in this town? A few years ago, I was going to a party, standing on the curb, trying to hail a cab in the rain, my nice suit getting soaked. It was dreadful. There I was, with hundreds of drivers passing me by, but no cabs.

'A few of my friends and I created a service app that helps people find a ride from people going in the same direction as they are. The app lets you find someone to carpool with and allows you to help pay the driver for petrol as a thank you. We're raising our startup capital, and from the number of sign-ups from drivers and riders, I think this is going to be a huge company in a few years. You seem to fit our investor profile, and I'd love to talk more. Do you have a card?'

How to structure your own elevator pitch

Follow these steps to create your own elevator pitch:

1. Open with a hook ---- CREA UN INCIPIIT ACCATTIVANTE

Your first task is to capture the audience's interest. This can be as simple as presenting a problem or asking your listener if they have the problem that your pitch addresses.

Not only can this help you adjust as you're speaking if the question doesn't quite land, but it can also draw your listener in through interaction. By making the problem explicit, you're also helping your listener become emotionally involved in what you're saying.

2. Present yourself through a story – the story create connection

In your pitch, you don't have time to say much, so what you do say needs to show what you're passionate about and express some of your personal attributes and values. Craft a relatable story that shows more than just a snapshot of who you are now. Connect your story with your hook and relate why you care about the issue you mentioned and what you're doing about it. Being an active doer is a compelling trait, and by showing yourself in this light, you can keep your listener engaged.

How to structure your own elevator pitch (2)

3. Communicate the relevant value

The next step is to communicate a value that is relevant to your hook and personal story. Whether you're working on a project, looking for a job or simply trying to make a new friend, creating a vivid picture of what you're working towards can get your listener's attention and make them excited about the world you're building.

4. End with a call to action

Finally, give your audience something to do with the information you just presented. You might ask them to exchange contact information, to schedule a further conversation or if there's a place you could send your CV or portfolio. Depending on the goal of your pitch, decide what your desired outcome from the elevator pitch is ahead of time, and use that to create an effective call to action.

Tips for delivering an elevator pitch

Avoid technical and abstract jargon

When delivering your elevator pitch, try to pitch your idea in an unhurried yet confident way to leave a positive impression on your listener.

Here are a few other tips to help you deliver your pitch successfully:

Show confidence without arrogance

Confidence is a deeply attractive trait, whether seen socially or in business.

Too much confidence, however, may come off as arrogance.

There is an important distinction between confidence and arrogance.

At an interview or a networking event, to be confident but not arrogant, focus on discussing your work and showing your knowledge of the industry to express who you are as a professional. Show your passion and confidence in your knowledge of the subject matter, and keep your focus on the craft.

Tips for delivering an elevator pitch

Don't ask for too much

While your ultimate goal may be to sell a product, find an investor or get a job, don't expect a single short interaction to get you there. A 30-second elevator pitch is best used to establish a relationship and leave a good first impression. Instead of risking scaring off the audience, establish their interest and get their contact information so that you can have a more in-depth conversation at a later time.

Relax and slow down

To ensure that all of your planning and hard work pays off, it's important to relax when giving your pitch. With all that thinking about how you present yourself, it's easy to become nervous. By breathing deeply and speaking slowly, you can keep yourself calm and collected. If you consciously slow down your speaking, you can help yourself appear and feel more in control, which can naturally draw your listener's attention to your words and increase their comprehension.
